BRUXELLES, LE 13th of April.
11, RUE D'EGMONT

Dear Margaret,

Here we are in Brussells, Dr. Warren and I, ready for another day of interviews and visiting. We came here from Paris yesterday and shall return there to-morrow, as plane service between here and London has been interrupted. We expect to fly from Paris to London Monday morning. So far we have been able to follow out our program in full in spite of the events in Norway.

Yesterday, after calling on the Medical Adviser to the Colonies about yellow fever research in Africa, we made a visit to Dr. Van den Berghe, who read a paper on yellow fever at last summer's Congress for Microbiology in New York. He broke his leg recently in an automobile accident and has been laid up in his home. His wife is naturally much concerned with the possibility of sudden German invasion and the necessity of fleeing with two young children and a husband with a broken leg! There are few outward signs of the war here, — no blackouts nor food restrictions. In France there are rules about the kinds of food you can eat on certain days, but you have plenty.

This morning we shall go to Antwerp to visit the School of Tropical Medicine of which Prof. Rodhain is director, and at noon we shall see the Minister of the Colonies.

I have written Peg, but I do not know whether she and Wallace have reached London yet. I hope to see them next week.

Dr. Warren is ready to start for the station, so I must stop.

With much love,

Hilton.
