Dear Harrison,

Years ago the Bulletin was the place to go for enlightened and informed discussion of national security policy matters.

It has become in some measure politically sanctified — as effective by its heading, which goes far beyond the article in negating the spirit of open discussion. This unhappy matter too might be gratuitous to the development of sound policy.

The Bulletin does have occasional "alternatives opinions," but I fear its achieving an image of anti-US establishment views that is clouding its utility as a source of depressed state wisdom. You had a chance to lead that field, but not too many were seized — if that is your wish.

Yours,
